March Troops on the March.
The "Traveling Correspondent" of the Daily Telegraph gives us an interesting account of the march of the

As the regiments march through the streets on their road to the railway station, some peculiar features of the French military system are visible. That discipline appears to be a combination of the best of the British and the French.

strictest rules of discipline possible, and with the utmost toleration in minor matters, and the practical working of the system would appear to be eminently successful. There is a plenitude of powder, a well nigh total absence of pipeclay. The soldiers are allowed to march anywhere—in arms—with their relations, friends and sweethearts, who insist on carrying the packs, the shelter tents, the trenching tools and cooking utensils. The officers, however, do not allow a breach of discipline.

ine in many cases. The boy seems to be committed when a gray-haired grandfather, the tears streaming down his face, trudges by the side of the boy who is going to the front for the first time, and actually shoulders the musket which the boy is to wield before the enemy. Nor is authority shocked when private X wears a billycock hat rather than one side of his head, while a civilian friend in a blouse is crowned with X's band, which is much too large for him.

The shopkeepers on the line of march press on the troops and load them with bottles of wine, bundles of cigars, and cans of sausages. You may see one entire sugar-loaf tucked beneath his arm which some patriotic grocer had bestowed

"Arrived at the railway station, a full half-hour is given loiterers to come up; and then a sudden transformation scene occurs. The free and easy warriors become as solid and well 'dressed up' as Roman legionaries; captains and adjutants are stern, and sergeants and corporals look black as thunder; only the kind old colonel—say that it is the forty-fourth of the line, and that the commanding officer is—in waiting the traditional gourd which is the palladium of the regiment, and was worn by his predecessor at Austerlitz—only this old generalman, with his bronzed face and white moustaches, as he dismounts from his horse, takes off his kepi, discloses his grey, close, closely cropped poll, and cries, "Mes enfants, vive la France!" He does not cry as anybody. He has been fighting so long that he respects his foes. Les enfants fall in with mechanical regularity and are speedily engulphed by the railway cars. Everything is done with mathematical strictness; but, in contradistinction to the English military rule of 'silence in the ranks,' the troops are allowed to sing 'La Marseillaise' and 'Mourir pour la Patrie' until they are hoarse. Are not sailors encouraged to sing as they work the capstan? And also, with this farewell, they are borne away to the distant land, to return God knows to the disaster which befell them when. It must be noted that many of the officers are not too proud to carry knapsacks containing their personal necessities, and that almost universally, spare uniforms have been discarded, the only emblem of rank being a gold stripe or galon on one arm. They are paid a bounty when they march, under the title of entraes en comadre and the captains six hundred francs.

Funeral of the Murderer Executed.
We take the following from the New York Evening Post of Monday: The funeral of John Real, who was hanged on Friday for the murder of policeman John Smedick, took place yesterday, and, as was expected, it was the signal for an outpouring of the ruffianly elements of the city, as was the case when Logan and other persons dying violent deaths were buried.

Had Real been a respectable member of society, and had died in some noble cause, or in performing an heroic act, it would have been difficult to make a greater demonstration over his obsequies. The display of yesterday was significant in this, that it shows to what extreme a morbid curiosity and mistaken sympathy can carry a certain class of the community.

The funeral took place from the residence of his brother-in-law, in Third avenue, near One Hundred and Fifth street, at the late day of the body, which and throughout the day and body was laid out in a habit of the Order of Mount Carmel, was viewed by a curious crowd. The avenue was thronged during the morning, and when the coffin was brought forth at two o'clock, and placed on the sidewalk, the crowd was so great that the police were unable to make a passage-way for the cars.

When those in the street who had been unable to enter the house had viewed the remains, they unswayed and denigrated.

body, the coffin was placed in a hearse drawn by four gray horses, decorated with white and black plumes. The procession then formed and moved down the avenue to Thirty-fourth street. It contained organizations of between six and seven thousand members in the aggregate (who wore mourning badges on their lapels) and one hundred and fifty carriages. It was about two miles in length, and was witnessed by many thousand people. — to view it

The funeral procession reached the cemetery about five o'clock, and after a short service in the chapel, the coffin was removed to the grave for interment. Here an extraordinary scene occurred. The coffin had been lowered and the work of filling began when a strange man leaped from the grave and drew a revolver. Be-into the grave. Therefore he could us it, a member of the Tenth regiment wrested it from his grasp, and a scene of the wildest excitement followed. Women and children screamed and fled in dismay, while men put a rope about the intruder's neck and some shouted "Hang him!" "Shoot him!" "Kill him!" A part of the mob made an endeavor toynch him, while some did their best to save him from the fury of the lawless. Finally, through the efforts of Father Joyce, the officiating priest, he was rescued from the incensed mob and given in charge of the Long Island police, who took him to New York, where he was locked up. Thus ended the last act of the tragedy, whose author has occupied the attention of the authorities and the people for more than two years.

The same paper says editorially: Few citizens will, after this, be willing to accept of a public funeral. It is quite possible that the societies who took part in the procession believed sincerely that Real had been hanged out of political spite; but they would have done better, even in that case, to suffer him to be buried privately, and punish by their silence those whom they thought to blame. The public display which they made is a disgrace to the city; and it is mortifying to think that the leaders of the Democratic faction, who are understood to have made this demonstration had no more sense and did not want to permit their followers to do what they did.

Miscellaneous.

A place called Mountain View, Virginia, to the east of the city, is the highest point in the State. It is a game with Ohio, but it would have no show for "high," as the Buckeyes raise it to twenty feet, and call it "high." Upon this Mountain View says: "We believe they raise very fair corn in Virginia and Ohio, but if it grows no higher than that mentioned above, the less said of it in the newspapers the better. It is not unusual in Kansas to see corn that is as high as eight feet, and it can only be gathered by the use of ladders, or by cutting the stalks down with an axe, as they fell trees in Maine."

An association of land-owners has been formed in San Francisco to defend itself against the pettifoggery, who make a business of threatening owners, whose titles they suppose to be imperfect, for blackmail purposes. These wretches sometimes offer to withdraw claims against estates valued at thousands of dollars for fifty or one hundred dollars, and honest holders frequently pay the claims rather than go to law. Now there is to be an end to this practice.

M. Albert Wolf, one of the most brilliant writers on the staff of the Paris Figaro, is a Russian, and has retired to Interlaken, where he will live for the remainder of his life.

The Dunsmuir, the official organ of the government of the United States, has been declared by the French Emperor's declaration that he had no idea of aggrandizement, said that only a born idiot would believe in Napoleon.

Speaking of poor Prevost Paradol, a French correspondent, who leaves three children entirely destitute, and is fondly attached to them, and nothing but madness could have induced him to leave them penniless and unprotected. Besides, he was not at all a desponding or low-spirited man. He had attained to the height of his ambition, for he had long desired and solicited the elevated diplomatic post which Count Daru at first objected to give him, on account of there being several unemployed ministers plentifully. It is said that a subscription will be opened for his family.

Jersey City has a ghost, and the New York Star gives a very sensational picture of the beast at a window: two persons are to be seen cowering with horror depicted on their faces.

Meetings are called in Iowa counties to organize companies for the purpose of defeating the collection of taxes to pay the interest on railroad bonds.

Part of the original manuscript of "Oliver Twist" was sold at auction a few days ago, and was bought by Mr. John Forster for fifty pounds.

Anna Dickinson's friends deny that she ever planned or thought of planning a joint lecture tour with Oliver Logan.

The developments of the Illinois coal fields, is claimed to be due to the fact that a country could not be destined by Providence to be without fuel. "The world is nearly gone," said he to himself: "and there shall be no more coal." In this country, a coal mine has been sunk a shaft 100 feet, and then struck a vein of bituminous coal, which is now mining to the amount of $2,700 per week.
